Three large units at the New Horizon Apartments in Whitehaven have been transformed and are now filled with young children engaged in virtual learning while volunteers keep them on task. The free virtual learning lab is just one component of the work done by the faith-based nonprofit Red Door Urban Missions, which converted space that – before the coronavirus pandemic was used for after-school programs – into a spot for everyday school. Soon, Red Door will grow its partnership with ARISE2Read, another faith-based nonprofit agency, in its work to help children in Memphis read at grade level.

The name, Red Door, speaks to the Bible's Old Testament and God's instructions to the Israelites to paint their doors with lamb's blood so that they would be safe and the angel of death would pass them by. Eric Watkins, its founder and executive director, started the nonprofit in 2019 as a grassroots organization to serve those who are "marginalized, neglected and ignored," said Watkins, who did ministry work for years before officially starting a nonprofit agency. Watkins was raised in church and graduated from Morehouse College with a finance degree, but acknowledges to another life lived in the streets.

"I surrendered to Christ. God told me to stop building businesses and start building people," said Watkins, a member of Bellevue Baptist Church, which helps support the ministry. The nonprofit operates: FLOW G, a residential home for men who have been in incarcerated; Myia's House, a residential home for pregnant teen mothers with nowhere to go; I Have A Name, a monthly outreach ministry for drug-addicted street prostitutes; and Apartment Life, which takes the ministry into area apartment complexes. They work with residents in the Peppertree, Bent Tree and Cedar Mill apartments in Whitehaven. "We're in impoverished communities. If we shut down our doors, there are a lot of wonderful children and families who will be really hurt," Watkins said. Two of the three apartments at New Horizon are used for virtual learning.

They have first through fifth grade, a few middle-school students and two high school students. His numbers, he said, could be anywhere from three to 43, depending on the day. Last year, Red Door connected with literacy nonprofit ARISE2Read, which donated about 500 books.

With the same goals around faith and education, ARISE2Read volunteers held a vacation Bible school for Red Door kids.

"And the kids loved it so much," said Karen Vogelsang, ARISE2Read executive director. "And so, we started an after-school Bible club on Monday afternoons."

Nathiana Robinson, 12, a sixth-grade student at Geeter Middle School, is a virtual learner at Red Door. Nathiana was part of the summer reading program and attends the Ministry Mondays. "It's fun because we get to come up here and we watch videos about the New Testament and the Old Testament and we learn new things every Monday," Nathiana said. As a middle-schooler, she doesn't necessarily have to attend a virtual learning center. "Some days I'm like I don't wanna come. Some days, I wanna come. And some days my mama makes us come," Nathiana said.

And next month the new literacy intervention program begins for up to 40 children. "That's to help the children that are reading below grade level to begin to make those strides to read at grade level and above," Watkins said. Experts have found that children who do not read at grade level are less likely to graduate from high school, will earn less money and potentially face incarceration. In preparation for the new initiative, they've pretested the kids in the virtual learning hub, Vogelsang said.

"We're in the process of recruiting volunteers, and we'll be out here to provide ARISE2Read support," she said. ARISE2Read has more than 1,200 trained volunteers and a third of them are willing to go face to face to help the children, Vogelsang said. With the learning losses for students because of the disruptions associated with the COVID-19 pandemic, state officials are now trying figure out tutoring support, she said. "We're like 'here we are,'" Vogelsang said.

There are a few things to know about Charisse Madlock-Brown before you know she is working on one of the biggest clinical databases in medical history. Of course, it's COVID-19 related. And it's come together in less than a year. She skipped her senior year of high school in Iowa City, Iowa, to start college at Bard's College at Simon's Rock in Massachusetts, where the whole idea is to give enterprising high school students an early start.

One of her best friends there earned a Ph.D. before a high school diploma. "You miss out on too much wasting time ..." Madlock-Brown, 39, says.

"I like moving from planning to action." Her specialty is health informatics, the whole field of IT born when hospitals and clinics put their medical records online. Suddenly, there was a way to mine all the pieces of data that once were handwritten in patient charts and filed away.

Last spring, she received her first grant from the National Institutes of Health to sift through the medical records of 70 million patients, looking specifically at those with two or more underlying conditions, noting how often the conditions occur, in what combination and what it costs to treat them.

Within weeks, COVID-19 made those skills essential when it became apparent that the people dying most often from COVID had other health issues. In Shelby County, for instance, people with heart conditions account for 52% of the COVID deaths, followed by respiratory diseases and diabetes.

Madlock-Brown, assistant professor at the University of Tennessee Health Science Center, is now leading a team of national data experts digging into the medical records of 2.5 million people who were tested for COVID in dozens of clinical centers across the nation.

The members are gleaning medical evidence from 147 million doctor visits, overlaying it with Google Maps and public databases on employment, food security and access to medical care, to tease out factors that may prove why some people are more vulnerable to COVID, or what life conditions hamper recovery, which could include poor air quality from neighborhood fixtures, like factories.

Medicine calls these factors social determinants of health, the key pieces of people's daily lives that can define their health, based on where they live and work and what they do for leisure.

The determinants can have a profound impact on how COVID affected them.

"What we want to do is not just come up with a general picture but look at it as the pandemic progressed. And we had things like policies that help mitigate transmission, how did they work for socially vulnerable groups?" she said.

Her work is part of the National COVID Cohort Collaborative — NC3 for short — an open-science community focused on analyzing patient-level data from dozens of clinical centers to reveal patterns in COVID patients. Each person in the database was tested for COVID.

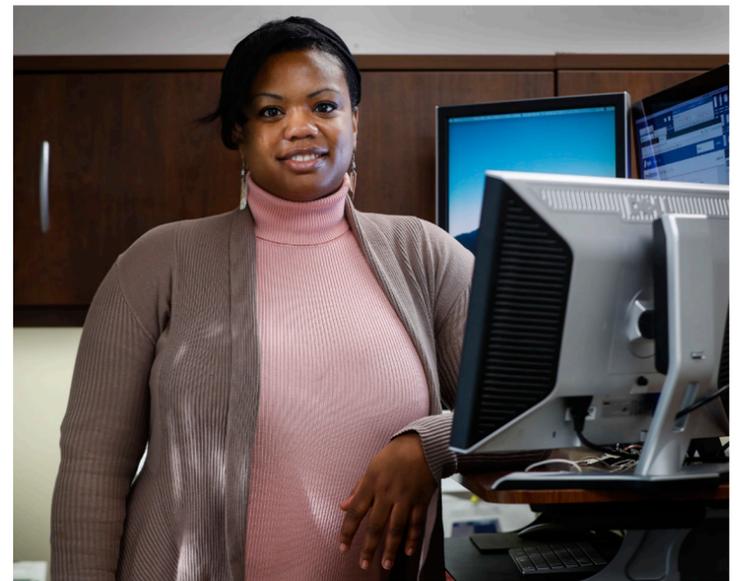

For every positive case, the data includes two who tested negative, says Melissa Haendel, director of the Center for Data to Health at the Oregon Clinical and Translational Research Institute at Oregon Health and Science University in Portland and one of three directors of NC3 project.

"To our knowledge, no one has ever collected this much clinical data from electronic health records and put it all in one place and made it publicly accessible. So, this is really a first," she said.

NC3 is a funded by the National Institutes of Health and private philanthropy and grew quickly from the reality that COVID presented enormous scientific and societal challenges that required quick and broad sharing of data.

About 75 institutions have signed on; 45 have done all the work to pass NC3's quality assurance and harmonization processes, or what Haendel calls the "messy cleanup" to have their data included.

"What makes this unique, I would say, is the collaboration of all different types of people from all the different centers from around the country, working together on this initiative," said Anita Walden, assistant director, also from Oregon Health and Science University. "Everybody just came together back in March and said, 'Let's do this.' We launched it," she said.

The database is open to researchers of all kinds, including high school students, although it is accessed through a secure cloud portal.

"It takes a village, and it means that we want the people who are machine-learning experts at Google, if they want to volunteer their time, to come and help,"

Haendel said. "They're not clinical experts, but it's all about the country's shared expertise and bringing these people together to try to analyze these data and reveal key patterns," she said.

Researchers are digging into a dozen medical specialties, including cardiology, emergency medicine, neurology and pregnancy. So far, Madlock-Brown's work with social determinants is drawing much of the national attention, Walden said.

"There's just a lot of things relative to health that people are really excited about," Walden said. "We get questions about

When Miles Tamboli opened his Midtown Memphis restaurant, Tamboli's Pasta & Pizza, in November 2019, he had no idea what the next year would hold for him and his business.

"We were dine-in only for those first five months," he said.

Tamboli quickly pivoted his business model in March when restaurants were closed under "Safer at Home" COVID-19 orders, offering takeout, curbside pickup and delivery.

He also turned part of his business into a small grocery store, which he said helped him get through the first few months of the pandemic.

"I was a farmer before I started the restaurant," Tamboli said. "My friends are people who make food. It was pretty easy to get that food into the restaurant to distribute out and make up for a bit of what folks weren't able to get at the grocery store."

To help sustain the business, Tamboli took advantage of the first round of Paycheck Protection Program (PPP) funds, which was the "right amount" for eight weeks of payroll. However, the pandemic lasted much longer than he anticipated.

"I have a degree in public health, which I thought I would never use," he said. "Turns out, it was a pretty great thing for our current circumstances."

Tamboli spent 100% of PPP funds on payroll and is confident the loan will be forgiven.

"It was not quite enough to really cover everything, but it was enough to cover us from going out of business."

As the next round of PPP relief opens for applications, Tamboli plans to apply and use the funds to keep his staff employed. Originally, Tamboli employed 35-36 people and is now down to around 20.

"We have new staff who were in a really tough financial situation before they found a job, and it makes me queasy to think about what could happen if things went south financially," he said. "Our philosophy is to take care of our people, keep them healthy and keep them paid."

Rory Thomas is executive director of the Tennessee Small Business Development Center located at Southwest Tennessee Community College. Such satellite offices located throughout the U.S. are the Small Business Administration's (SBA) largest providers of resources. There are 14 across the state of Tennessee.

"This (the PPP funds) is another lifeline for a lot of small businesses going into 2021, especially with different industries that have had to close their doors or limit their capacity," Thomas said.

Some major changes in the Second Draw of PPP funds include the following:

- Borrowers can set their coverage period to spend PPP funds from eight to 24 weeks;
- PPP loans can cover additional expenses besides payroll, including

Hunter Fan unleashing light fixtures in firm's 135th year

The West Tennessee News

Memphis-based Hunter Fan Company in 2020 dipped its toe into the waters of lighting fixtures — pendant, chandelier, flush mount and others — but is diving headfirst in 2021.

The oldest and largest maker of ceiling fans last year introduced about 25 distinct styles of lighting fixtures installed on ceilings or walls. They are light fixtures only; they are not attached to ceiling fans.

This year, the company's goal is to offer a much broader array of light fixtures in addition to its many hundreds of ceiling fan products. Fleshing out the new type of product is one of several ways Hunter Fan plans to mark its 135th year in 2021, John Neilson said.

"We're pretty excited about that," the chief marketing officer said of the new lighting-fixture-only products. "Our products will start to be available this month, and we'll do a larger launch" starting in July.

Neilson leads marketing for the firm headquartered in Memphis. That's where about 135 Hunter Fan executives, engineers, industrial designers, finance staff and others work when there's not a pandemic. Since last March, most have worked from home.

Hunter Fan was born in New York state, and moved to Memphis in 1946 and 1949.

The company sells 4 million fans a year. This year, Hunter also will release its latest innovations for ceiling fans that are remotely controlled using WiFi. Called SIMPLEconnect fans, they also can be controlled with voice commands in concert with Apple, Google and Amazon products.

The company also plans to release this year more versions of its new outdoor fans, dubbed WeatherMax. They are resistant to salt air and corrosion.

And Hunter plans to expand its partnership this year with the St. Jude Dream Home event that raises money for the children's research hospital. Hunter Fan will provide ceiling fans and light fixtures to St. Jude Dream Homes in five markets across the U.S. A growing emphasis on e-commerce sales threads through nearly all of Hunter Fan's plans for 2021.

The trend, accelerated by the pandemic, was a factor in the company creating a new position last year, director of e-commerce.

The company has placed an emphasis on e-commerce since Neilson came aboard seven years ago. But the pandemic has accelerated online activity by about three to five years, Neilson said.

The presence of e-commerce takes many forms for the company: Direct-to-consumer sales through its own website, HunterFan.com; Amazon; and the online sales through retailers like Home Depot, Lowe's and Costco.

Now that people are spending more time at home because of COVID-19, they are tackling more home-improvement jobs. Included in those DIY tasks are the installation of ceiling fans, Neilson said.

"At the core of what we do, we help consumers enhance the spaces where they live, work and play, he said, adding that demand for Hunter Fan's products rose last year.

"Also, younger consumers are gaining new skills, primarily through YouTube," he said. "The whole do-it-yourself movement in general is really growing."

Energy-saving responses to an even larger problem — global warming — may boost demand for ceiling fans, too.

"A ceiling fan inherently increases your comfort," Neilson said. "It allows you to raise the thermostat a couple degrees and that reduces the need for electricity. It reduces the need for refrigerants, for HVAC."

Hunter Fan commands about 30% of the ceiling fan market, by far the largest share, Neilson said, adding that the second-place company has about 10% of the

State senator charged in new federal fraud complaint

BILL DRIES

The West Tennessee News

Democratic state Sen. Katrina Robinson has been charged in a second round of federal wire fraud and money laundering allegations, federal prosecutors announced Tuesday, Jan. 19.

The charges in a criminal complaint filed Jan. 14 and made public Tuesday by U.S. Attorney Michael Dunavant allege Robinson and codefendants Katie Ayers and Brooke Boudreaux swindled someone identified in the complaint as "R.S." out of $14,470.

Robinson was indicted in July on federal charges of stealing, converting and intentionally misapplying funding for her own use, including federal funding, to The Healthcare Institute she founded in 2015. She is awaiting trial on those charges.

The new criminal complaint alleges that Robinson, Ayers and Boudreaux convinced "R.S." to give money to Boudreaux, whom R.S. knew, so that Boudreaux could attend classes at the institute, which trains people for health care industry jobs.

But Boudreaux was never a student at the institute.

The complaint includes an affidavit filed by FBI special agent Brent A. Hayden that includes text messages between Ayers and Robinson.

Two from Robinson to Ayers read: "How much money does Aunt Katie need? I need to know cuz I need to get some cash too.

State Sen. Katrina Robinson (shown at a press conference on July 29, 2020, after her July indictment) faces new federal charges.

(Mark Weber/The West Tennessee News)

How much money do you need to get out of this transaction?"

According to the complaint, Ayers responded, "What's the most for all classes?"

"I was asking so I know how much to charge him so I can get some cash," Robinson replies.

Two days later, more text messages between Robinson and Ayers include one by

Robinson reading: "Love u too: now erase all this s--t."

Prosecutors allege Boudreaux got $10,000 from Robinson with a check that says it is for a "tuition refund." Boudreaux then allegedly endorsed the check to a business co-owned by Ayers.

Boudreaux told FBI agents of the transaction in September, according to the affidavit. Like the charges in the 2020 indictment, the allegations in the complaint date back to 2017 before Robinson ran for and won a state Senate seat in 2018.

Robinson had no immediate response to the new allegations. She pleaded not guilty to the July charges and said she would fight them.

operations expenses, property damage costs, supplier costs and worker protection expenditures;

- Eligibility is expanded to include 501(c)(6) entities such as chambers of commerce, housing cooperatives, direct marketing organizations and others;

- The PPP provides greater flexibility for seasonal employees;

- Certain existing PPP borrowers can request to modify their First Draw PPP loan amount;

- And certain existing PPP borrowers are now eligible to apply for a Second Draw PPP loan.

- Another change, according to Thomas, is that businesses need to have experienced a 25% revenue drop from any quarter of 2019 compared to the same quarter in 2020 if they are applying for a second time or for additional loan funds. The First Draw of PPP did not require any evidence of reduced revenue or decline in sales.

- Also, if the PPP loan application amount is under $150,000, businesses only need to "self-certify." "If it's over $150,000, you have to provide evidence to SBA via tax returns and other documents," Thomas said. Thomas' office also handles Economic Injury Disaster Loans (EIDL) and NEED grants authorized by the Economic Development Growth Engine for Memphis and Shelby County (EDGE). Since the pandemic hit, his staff has been inundated, providing resources to more than 1,100 businesses.

Daphnie Swift, president of A Cut Above Lawn Service Corp., took part in the first round of the PPP and is looking forward to applying for the second draw.

"It (PPP) helped with payroll and with the new requirements in just trying to ensure the safety of everyone," she said. "We have to secure masks and sanitizer and ensure the trucks are sanitized daily."

She said her business lost $85,000 to $90,000 in revenue in 2020 due to COVID-19. Part was caused by the season being delayed due to business closures as well as losing a contract with the City of Memphis, which was canceled due to safety concerns.

PPP applications opened for small lenders on Friday, Jan. 15 and opened to all lenders Tuesday, Jan. 19. Sean Henneberger with Pinnacle Financial Partners, which processed about $2.4 billion in First Draw PPP loans to 14,000 clients, said that the bank is "all in" when it comes to helping customers, although all the details have not been solidified. "I think it's going to be similar to these conversations we had with the first round of PPP — I think it's going to continue to evolve," Henneberger said. "As a bank and lender, we're just trying to provide the information as we have it. "It's kind of like that first wave (of PPP), there was a lot of speculation on what it would look like, and then things changed more or less last minute. At this point, it's kind of a waiting game," Henneberger said. "The proposed bill is out there that passed, but there's some fine tuning that needs to happen."

Charisse's group all the time because of that." For Madlock-Brown, it is personal. As a person of color, she grew up knowing Black people did not get the same medical care as others did and certainly not as white people did.

"I remember my grandma telling me that back in her day, if you were an African American woman, you weren't going to get a C section; you weren't really going to get medication. They just expected you to give birth," Madlock-Brown said. "She knew that. She needed a C section, and they did not give that to women like her." That led me to be more interested in issues of social determinants of health. I teach a health outcomes and policy Ph.D. program with an informatics track." In the last two years, she says, there has been a palpable shift to taking these issues more seriously, enough that she started looking at social determinants of health as a maturing research topic. "The reason I stepped up to say yes to lead the social determinants of health group is that I already had a personal interest, but professionally, I started to really familiarize myself with this research area." She will be presenting NC3's role in data mining at an online seminar on Feb. 1, offered by the Trial Innovation Network.

Her committee is already showing that COVID in rural areas, particularly when shelter-in-place orders happened in late 2020, was more severe than in cities.

"Early on, these counties had high incidence of COVID and continued to have higher incidence, even through the summer," she said. It is showing similar conclusions for counties with high numbers of essential workers, including Shelby County.

Early data already show interesting things in Shelby County, including the racial divide in who is getting the vaccine. Last week, the Shelby County Health Department said by Jan. 7, white people had received 51.9% of the vaccine (5,417 doses) compared to Black people who had received 24.4% (2,548 doses). Black people in Shelby County represent 52% of the population; white people represent about 40%. Vaccination rates by cities in Shelby County show that Arlington is the highest with 9,836 vaccinated per 100,000 residents, followed by Germantown with 6,362. Even though far more people in Memphis have been vaccinated (14,007), its rate is the lowest per 100,000 people at 2,163.

Data on occupation and the percentage of people in each community living in congregate settings could shed light on the differences. People who live in communities with higher levels of immunity, due to the vaccine, could have different outcomes. "More affluent areas tend to have greater health care access in general," Madlock-Brown said, "and tend to be more proactive in seeking the services." Health records don't show who lives next to a factory or a busy road, but Google Maps do. When combined, the data reveal much more, Madlock-Brown says, about the everyday lives of people and how their environments, including proximity to grocery stores and whether they have a car or not, affect how much COVID hurts their community.

"Data can explain things without putting the problem on disadvantaged groups," she said. "The temptation is to say 'Oh, they do this' or 'They must be genetically predisposed' or 'Maybe it's their environment.'"

"Data will help us not jump to general or behavioral conclusions when something else could be happening."

FAN CONTINUED FROM P4

market. As customers shift from brick-and-mortar to online shopping, Hunter Fan's market share will only rise, Neilson said.

"We can offer a broader selection online than inside a Lowe's or Home Depot, which have a limited amount of (display) space. ... And secondly, we have the leading brand. When consumers want to ensure they have good quality, we have a great reputation as they move to e-commerce," he said. Hunter Fan learned something important through testing its fans with volunteers. Perceived comfort is more affected by the air speed created by fan blades than the volume of air moved by the blades. That's the central idea behind what Hunter Fan calls its SureSpeed Guarantee. The company commits that its fans produce a 20% higher air-flow velocity than Hunter Fan's top competitors.

"If it's 95 degrees outside and your air conditioner is cranking as hard as it can, you want to really feel the breeze inside," said Erin Shelton, the company's senior brand marketing manager. "And that doesn't always translate with CFM (cubic feet per minute). You need that air-flow velocity." Think about it, Neilson said. "You don't feel CFM if you go outside. It's how many miles per hour is the wind blowing. That's what you feel." Faster spinning blades don't cause the air to move faster. Instead, the velocity is attained with the blade design and how the blades are matched to the motor, he said. "Most of our competitors essentially have a flat board, a flat paddle. We added some aerodynamic elements in some ways," he said. Hunter Fan occupies the 7130 Goodlett Farms office building with Regions Bank and a few smaller tenants. On one wing, Hunter Fan takes the fourth floor, third floor and basement.

On Tuesday, Jan. 19, the building was mostly vacant as it has been since March, because of the pandemic. But product testing must continue, so several masked engineers worked in the basement. The basement includes about a dozen testing spaces. In one room on Tuesday, a metal structure positioned 45 velocity sensors 43 inches beneath the blades of a ceiling fan. Down the hall were other small testing stations, nearly a dozen in all.

Among them was one small space that was partitioned from the hall by clear, shower curtain-like material.

That's where Hunter Fan tests its outdoor fans by spraying water on them for four hours at a time. In another space, blade supports were connected to a fan motor on one side and heavy pieces of metal on the other side, where a much lighter blade would normally be. A machine shakes the brackets for an hour to test their strength.

Other stations test fans for quietness, the durability of components as well as other reasons. In addition to its in-house engineering team, Hunter Fan has an in-house design team. "A lot of other companies, they are farming that out to various vendors," Shelton said. "It's something we have kept internal and have actually continued to grow." "For 135 years, Hunter Fan Company has set the standard for quality and innovation in the ceiling fan industry, and we are continuing to look for that next level of product," chief executive John Alexander said in a prepared statement.

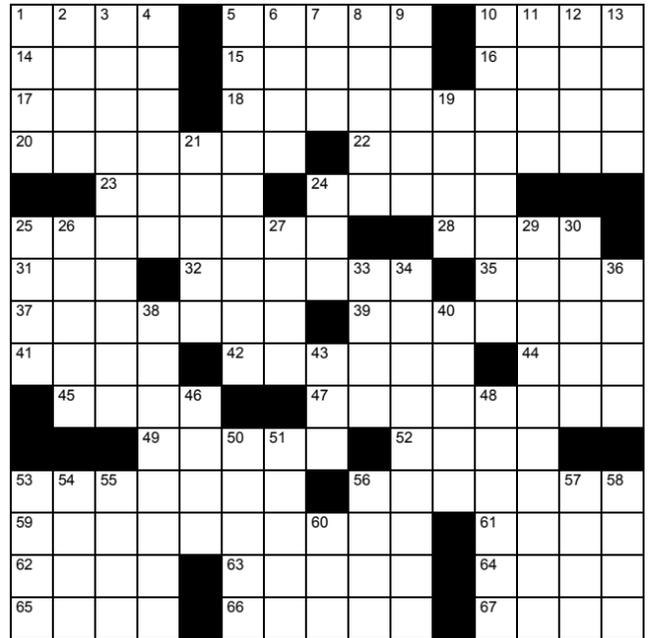

"We have a team of in-house designers and engineers that are constantly questioning how we can do more. Our history is important to us, but what is more important is our future," he said.
